What Do Bees Eat? Bees are flying insects, and they belong to the vastest insect order, which also includes ants and wasps. Most bees (with the example of the honey bees) are herbivores, feeding on pollen and nectar from flowers.. Few species, with the example of the necrophagous bee (Trigona hypogea), display predatory behavior meaning they feed on animal protein drawn from both corpses and ...

By contrast, bees, spiders, rattlesnakes and ants, among other things, are venomous. It is theoretically safe to eat or touch any of these animals without danger (note that I did say “theoretically” – touching rattlesnakes is usually a bad idea). But you sure don’t want to get bitten or stung by them.

Honey bee's skeleton. Like all insects, the honey bee's "skeleton" is on the outside.

This arrangement is called an exoskeleton. Nearly the entire bee is covered with branched hairs (like the needles on the branch of a spruce tree). A bee can "feel" with these hairs, and the hairs serve the bee well when it comes to pollination, because pollen sticks well to the branched hairs.
